in judgement on his own son, a young man of twenty-one, for committing adultery with the wife of a man of a former slave family. The husband brought the case against the chief's son, and the chief ordered the man to speak truly and not be afraid. The case was heard amid the most deathly silence. In awarding a heavy penalty of compensation against his son, the chief spoke of the central position of law in Ngoni life, and of the fact, so sharply brought out by the case, that the law was no respecter of persons.

Young adults, boys and girls, were held personally responsible for breaches of the law which they had committed. Penalties were awarded against them as individuals, even though they often could not pay the compensation without the help of their father and his family. They were expected to become acquainted with the law in various ways. One was by conformity to accepted social codes of behaviour, instilled into them by their elders, particularly in such matters as sex relations, respect for property, avoidance of slander and of injury by violence. Another way of learning how the law operated, as well as the principles upon which the case-law was built, was by attending the courts, and listening carefully to the cross-examinations as well as to the judgements. Young people were expected also to ask their fathers, and elders generally, about points of law which they had not understood, or had confused with some of the practices of the local people. The onus was upon young adults for acquiring this knowledge of the law as well as for behaving in accordance with it. We shall see in the next chapter how the Ngoni regarded being law-abiding as one of their basic cultural traits, as well as being evidence of the individual character of a young adult.

We made a distinction, albeit a rather tentative one, at the beginning of this chapter between certain kinds of traditional knowledge which we have been describing up to this so that anyone coming that way may see "medicine" and turn aside. After which, all bathe in the stream, and the ceremonies are over.

During a chipere dance six drums are always used, namely, the mphonje (five or six feet in length, and beaten at one end only); the ndonere (another large drum three feet in length), or the ndakula; the ndondondonda and the matarize (of medium size about two feet long); and two kondwanda (small drums eighteen inches in length). These are beaten by men detailed by the headman or chinkoka; but there are no special drums appertaining exclusively to particular mitimanda or mzuga. The big village drum always belongs to the headman; the others are privately owned, and are hired out for a small fee, such as an mwepu basket. Before use they are always warmed first at the fire.

4. Property.

Land was acquired by the Achewa by occupation and by the Angoni by conquest. It was divided by the paramount chief among his lieutenants, who in turn divided their sections among the heads of lesser groups or families. Each headman now allots land to his villagers; and if they move the village to a new site, everyone retains possession of the garden which he held before. The allottee is entitled to trees, cattle-pegs, honey or anything else on his plot; and he may sell crops or other produce, but may not sell or lease the land itself. When reaping his crop, he presents a basket of maize to his headman.

In the home, the wife must provide the pots, and they are her personal property. The husband must supply her with baskets, hoes, etc.; but everything which pertains to woman's work belongs to the wife. The produce of a garden is the equal property of both. After a boy has passed through his initiation, he is given a small garden of his own. When, as in the case of the Achewa, he leaves the village to marry, the garden reverts to the chief, who is always spoken of as the owner of the land, since it is he who divides it out among his people.

The majority of the cattle owners are Angoni. Possession is individual; but all the animals in one village are kept in one open kraal belonging to the village headman, who selects small boys to look after them. Herdsmen were formerly unpaid; but now, when a beast is sold, killed or otherwise removed, they receive a present from the owner, as also does the headman. There is no fixed fee; but the owner of a dozen head may give the headman a calf every other year, while the owner of one or two only gives him a goat. If a man living in a village where there is no kraal buys cattle, he frequently places them in the care of a friend at a neighbouring village where there is a kraal, instead of handing them over to his own headman. The friend makes his own arrangement with the headman; but the friend is liable to the owner, and the usual payment is made to the friend, who divides it with the headman.

N 672 233

If a beast dies in the kraal, there is no liability, provided that the headman (or responsible friend) informs the owner, so that the latter can make use of the meat. Should the headman or friend fail to do this, he must pay the owner a live animal of the same age and sex. Where loss occurs through the carelessness of a herdsman, a case for damages lies against him. Sometimes cows calve in the kraal, but generally they wander off into the bush for the purpose; if they are then lost, or killed by carnivora, there is no liability. If a cow sold as sound dies within about four months of purchase, the money is refunded, unless it is shown that the owner is to blame. In the case of a sheep or goat, this period is reduced to about six weeks. 233 [672]

It is not the custom to hire out cattle, either for ploughing, or for milk. If a cow brings forth twin calves together, she and her offspring are presented to the herdsman, as the cow is supposed to be an exceptionally good one; and the herdsman in return hands over three other animals of similar ages. V.—Social Organization: Military.

1. Preparations for War.

The Ngoni expeditions against the Achewa consisted principally of raids at times when the crops were ripening and they were short of food. At such times the young warriors who chiefted for war signified their desire by dancing outside the house of the chief. After they had danced for three evenings, the chief fixed a day, food was prepared, and warriors were summoned from the neighbouring villages. The sing'anga made medicine to protect them against the weapons of their enemies, and as the army filed past him, he dipped a hammer into the medicine; and struck each man on the chest with it. The best-known sing'anga under Chief Chiwere was Chimenga, and his name is still held in veneration. 721 726 756

2. Methods.

The Angoni usually came upon their foe unawares, and attacked with a rush. If they met with a stout resistance from a stockaded village, they surrounded it and camped till lack of water forced the besieged to sally forth. Quarter was rarely given to the men. 726

3. Subsequent Proceedings.

On their return, all who had killed a man repaired immediately to the sing'anga who mixed medicine with goats' milk. The warriors dipped their fingers in the mixture and put them into their mouths. Then they dipped again into the mixture, and rubbed it on their arms and legs, after which they stood up and shouted "O-o-o!" This form of purification was undergone in order to drive away the chimanda or affliction which they would otherwise suffer from the spirits of their dead enemies, and until they were cleansed they might not have any connexion with women. Next day, they burned goats' bones, pounded them and mixed them in water, smearing the mixture first on cheeks and throat and then over the remainder of their persons. After this they proceeded to their homes and, having decorated themselves, displayed their reasonable pride by jumping about before the chief, who sent for a bull to be cooked and eaten. Prisoners were paraded, and when a man had taken three or more, one of them was always returned to him by the chief. 727 [783] [755]
